Said The Following: "Reality check made me realize what I have to do as a cadet. Every person you talk to at Langley is telling you the same thing. They will never let you in; never trust you for any reason. They kill every agent that works there. Why would any agent work there? Any agent that works at Langley is at the same level as you. They are all marked with LANGLEY KILLER across their forehead." Final Diagnosis: Today's Last Cadet Said The Following: "It is time to select a candidate" Time to Choose A New Last Cadet The EndPerception of hyperintensity on unenhanced T1-weighted MR images of the brain in asymptomatic basal ganglia hyperintensities (BGHs) in the normal elderly (N.E.): does BGH cause these lesions? To analyze whether the pattern of hypointensity on unenhanced T1-weighted images (UTE) of the normal elderly could be correlated with the clinical characteristics or to the presence of other brain lesions, we performed a retrospective study in the normal elderly (NE) group of patients referred to the outpatient service to determine the presence of brain microbleeds (BMBs). Fifty three asymptomatic NE patients, aged 55 years or older, but no known neurodegenerative disorder, were included. The UTE was performed 3 mm above the level of the corticomedullary junction. The characteristics of the hypointensity on UTE images were estimated in relation to the clinical data in all patients and a limited subgroup of 9 patients, consisting of subjects with BMBs, chronic stage lacunar infarcts (cLI) and normal brain parenchyma. On UTE image, the BGHs were seen as hypointense areas in 35 out of 93 brain regions. The abnormalities were congruent with the distribution of perivascular spaces (73%) and dural sinuses (37%). None of the 53 patients had generalized vascular disease or atherothrombotic disease. In conclusion, BGHs are mainly lesions of dolichoectasia with a marked expansion of the perivascular space and dilatation of the adjacent dural sinuses. The pattern of hypointensity on UTE images is characteristic, but not pathognomonic. Therefore, the presence of this feature is not sufficient for the diagnosis
